'Tis the Season for Science

Do partridges really live in pear trees? Is it at all possible for a reindeer to be red-nosed? And where exactly does cinnamon come from, anyway? These and other important questions will be answered at the California Academy of Sciences' 'Tis the Season for Science' exhibition, taking place November 23 through January 16. Held under the undulating living roof of the world's greenest museum, this special exhibit explores our most treasured holiday symbols and traditions through the context of the natural world. Guests can experience indoor snow flurries in a wintery dome, visit a pair of live reindeer, and digest surprising scientific facts about everything from mistletoe to that curious spice we call cinnamon. Rare, arctic specimens, including polar bears, snow owls, and caribou, are on display, as well as Cal Academy's mascot, an albino alligator named Santa Claude. calacademy.org
